Siam Legal Chiang Mai Warns of Stricter Enforcement Against Visa Exemption Abuse in 2026

January 14, 2026 -
Siam Legal Chiang Mai, a premier legal and immigration firm serving Northern Thailand, has issued an advisory warning foreign nationals about intensified enforcement measures targeting visa exemption abuse throughout 2026. The firm reports that Thailand Immigration authorities are actively scrutinizing patterns of consecutive 60-day visa exemption entries that indicate long-term residence rather than genuine tourism.

The advisory comes as immigration officers increasingly deny entry to individuals who repeatedly use tourist exemptions to maintain continuous presence in Thailand. While the 60-day visa exemption remains available for legitimate short-term visitors, authorities are now examining travel history patterns to identify those circumventing proper visa requirements.

"Thailand Immigration has shifted from evaluating individual entries to analyzing overall travel patterns," said Apichart Mattayanuwat, spokesperson from Siam Legal Chiang Mai. "Foreign nationals who rely on visa runs every 60 days are discovering that what worked previously now triggers enforcement action. We're seeing entry denials at both airports and land borders, with serious consequences for those caught unprepared."

The enforcement initiative addresses both regulatory compliance and national security concerns. Immigration authorities have identified that repeated visa exemption use often correlates with failure to register addresses properly, tax non-compliance, and attempts to avoid background screening requirements. The pattern typically involves staying the full 60-day period, making brief exits to neighboring countries, and immediately re-entering Thailand on a new exemption.

Under current enforcement guidelines, immigration officers may deny entry to individuals who have used visa exemptions more than twice per calendar year in a continuous pattern suggesting long-term residence. Entry denial carries significant consequences, including deportation at personal expense, potential detention pending departure, denial stamps in passports, and complications for future travel to Thailand and other countries.

The firm emphasizes that Thailand continues to welcome genuine tourists and short-term business visitors. However, foreign nationals intending to remain in Thailand long-term must hold the appropriate visa for their purpose of stay, such as the Destination Thailand Visa (DTV), Long-Term Resident (LTR) Visa, Thailand Privilege Visa, or a qualifying Business Visa. The long-standing practice of relying on repeated visa runs to remain in the country has effectively ended.

Siam Legal Chiang Mai advises foreign nationals currently relying on repeated visa exemptions to reassess their immigration status immediately. Transitioning to proper visa status before encountering enforcement action proves far less costly and disruptive than resolving an entry denial situation.

The firm notes particular concern for digital nomads and remote workers who may have grown comfortable with visa run routines. These individuals face heightened risk as Thailand implements its new digital work permit system and strengthens enforcement of employment regulations.
